

Managing Cyber-social Campaign

- M. K. Valvi

Definition

- A social-media/cybersocial campaign is a coordinated marketing effort to reinforce or assist with a business goal using one or more social media platforms.
- Campaigns differ from everyday social media efforts because of their increased focus, targeting and measurability.

Managing Social Media Schedule

1. Bounding time commitment

Social media can become addictive. If you truly like what you're doing, the time problem might reverse. Rather than spend too little time, you spend too much.

- Selecting activity days : One way to control the time you spend on social media is to select specific days and times for it.
- Allowing for ramp-up time : Even if you're the only person involved, allow time for learning before your official social media launch date. Everyone needs time to observe, master new tools, practice posting and responding, experiment, and decide what works before you can roll out your plan.

Managing Social Media Schedule

2. Developing your social date book

Larger companies may use elaborate project management software, either proprietary solutions or open source programs such as Endeavour Software Project Management. Alternatively, you can schedule tasks using spreadsheet software. Look for a solution that lets you :

- Choose a display by day, week, or month or longer
- Lists events or tasks in chronological format
- Select different timeframes easily
- Easily schedule repeat activities without requiring duplicate data entry

3. Creating a social media dashboard

Your social media marketing efforts may ultimately involve many tasks: Post to multiple venues; use tools to distribute content to multiple locations; monitor visibility for your company on social media outlets; and measure results by using several different analytical tools. Rather than jump back and forth among all these different sources, a graphical dashboard or control panel can be a convenient timesaver.

Creating a Social Media Marketing Policy

General Guidelines :

- Hold individuals responsible for what they write.
- Disclose who you are, including your company name and title.
- Recognize that clients, prospects, competitors, and potential future employees are part of your audience.
- Be respectful of everyone.
- Understand the tenor of each social media community and follow its precepts.
- Respect copyright and trademarks.
- Protect your company's confidential trade secret and proprietary information in addition to client data, especially trade secret information under non-disclosure agreements.
- Do not allow personal social media activity to interfere with work.

Staying on the Right Side of the Law

1. Obtaining permission to avoid infringement

You can't (legally) use extended content from someone else's Web site, blog, or social media page on your own site, even if you can save it or download it.

Though small text extracts with attribution are permitted under fair use doctrine, the copyright concept is intended for individuals and educational institutions, not for profit-making companies. If you don't obtain permission, you and your company can be sued for copyright infringement. In the best- case scenario, you can be asked to cease and desist. In the worst case, your site can be shut down, and you might face other damages

Staying on the Right Side of the Law

Be especially careful with photographs, which are usually copyrighted. Here are a few places to find free or low-cost images legally:

- Select from the wealth of material offered under a Creative Commons license (<http://creativecommons.org>) or copyright-free images from the federal government.
- Flickr Commons (www.flickr.com/commons) has thousands of free photographs.
- Search <http://images.google.com> and read the copyright information at the top of each image.
- Look for stock images from inexpensive sources such as iStockphoto (www.istockphoto.com), Stock Exchange (<http://www.sxc.hu>), or freerangestock.com.

Trademarks and logos also usually require permission to use, though the logos (icons) that social media companies provide for Share This or Follow Us On functionality are fine to use without permission.

Staying on the Right Side of the Law

2. Revealing product endorsement relationships

- The rule requires bloggers to disclose whether they've received any type of payment or free products in exchange for a positive review.
- The rule doesn't appear to apply to individuals who post a review on public review sites such as Epinions.com or TripAdvisor or Yelp, but it applies if you review other companies' products on your blog or send products to other bloggers to request a review.

Protecting Your Brand

1. Copyrighting your material

- Copyright protects creative work in any medium — text, photos, graphics, audio, video, multimedia, software — from being used by others without permission or payment. Your work becomes your intellectual property as soon as you've created it in a fixed form. The rules for copyright are simple: Protect your own work and don't use other people's work without permission.
- Put a copyright notice on your Web site. The standard format includes the word copyright or copr or the symbol © followed by the year, name of copyright holder, and, usually, the term All Rights Reserved.

Protecting Your Brand

2. Trademarking your brand names

- Trademarks (for goods) or service marks (for services) give you the exclusive right to use a particular name or logotype within specific commercial categories.
- Trademark rights apply online. For instance, only the trademark owner has the legal right to register domain name with that trademark.

Protecting Your Brand

3. Protecting your brand reputation

- Start protecting your brand now by registering your name for social media accounts. To avoid "brandjacking," try to choose the most popular, available "handle" that will work across multiple sites. Use your company or product name and keep it short.
- Even if you don't plan to do anything else in social media for a year or more, register your name now on every social media.
